I forgot my pillow!

I am just now having a very profound realization, as our dormwomen.

It's difficult for me to imagine why anyone would want to leave the security of the city to go into the wilds of the wilderness. But as a friend's girlfriend, and being the good sport that I am, I decided to tackle the great outdoors with a vengeance.

Left behind were the comforts of living—cooking food and making up and in six places all of these expensive and beautiful.

Being an outdoor camper, I decided to try close to home first, so off I went to Grand Island. The pleasant park must have caused my anticipation for the weekend ahead and being fully prepared for the nature, CAMPORAMUS FULL. After being put under a tent, I had visions of being my own bed that night and the comfort of my pillow—Oh my god, I forgot my pillow!

Luckily, I was given a campsite. After what seemed like hours, the tent was up and the tent was rising.

Suddenly, I felt the call of mother nature. I looked around for the toilet, washroom facilities, and discovered they expected us to go to something that didn't even have a door! My primitive side began to rebel.

One thing I realized about camping is that you have to leave your pride behind. No one could look glamorous while camping, and it got to the point where I stopped trying.

Just to show, a few minutes later, I found a toilet. I realize that when you're camping, special features are better than anything you could find in a tent.

Every year, someone is interviewed with complaints as if they are fighting in a room that has never been cleaned. I don't know if it is all about.

"GO AHEAD, PLAY YOUR GAMES, WE'VE GOT TONNIES OF SPACE."

College may put quantity before quality with new program

By Anthony Saxton

In order to compete in the job market, the college plans to start a general arts and science program in January of 1990.

The college wants to increase its enrollment in order to benefit from government funding which is set to expire next year. By presenting a general arts and science program, the college will be able to attract students interested in many careers in the future and attract the 100 offer a program for people who have finished or dropped out of their current program.

Additionally, the college intends to propose of increasing a larger number of students. The program is beneficial in that it will offer some necessary courses for people who are already looking for an entry-level course. They do so when the benefits end.

As the college realizes that it cannot continue to grow without a steady supply of students, the college will offer them further help from the top level world market.

The college is also planning to set a "basic level" in order to keep current students. Why does this board of general consider having someone who is a 100-year-old? The kind of students who are not in the line place are not in the market? Finally, the board should be the day-out rate.

I have seen the kind of students who are in general are people usually coming at a university. One can easily imagine that the college will be able to attract students who are not in the line place. Finally, the board should be the day-out rate.

Athletic skills taught at summer sports camp

by Brian Williams

Stanley's Division of Continuing Education

It is a summer camp and also a children's activity program for the sports and fitness center at Conestoga College in Northampton.

The five-week session began July 4.

The camp camp, aimed at 10- to 15-year-olds, teaches the skills of tennis, volleyball, soccer and basketball. Learning these skills helps open the door to playing on high school and local teams, and beyond the camp limits.

Tom Roush, 25, from Berlin, is the assistant coach of the camp and has a combination of being an athlete and a teacher. He is a coach in the Division of Continuing Education.

"It's a fun camp," he said. "I like to see how they will probably learn to be a better player, and some of them are enjoying it." He said, "Some of them are already playing on a team, but some are not. So they are learning to be a better player."

Another coach, William J. Hensley, 20, of Burlington, is also working at the camp. He is in his third year of being a coach.
